

NEWS ROUNDUP

Ritholtz's Reads: Apple and Google Know What You Want

AUG 4, 2015 7:52 AM EDT

By Barry Ritholtz

a A

We have dug up quite an eclectic set of morning train reads for you to start your day with:

- Theft, Lies, and Facebook Video: Facebook says it's now streaming more video than YouTube. To be able to make that claim, all they had to do was cheat, lie, and steal (Medium)
- Hey, investment cranks: The Internet never forgets (Washington Post)
- Stock Guru Bill Miller Is Back But the Questions and Pain Linger (Bloomberg)
- The Golden Constant by Claude B. Erb, Campbell R. Harvey (SSRN)
- CEO pay out of line with free markets (Dallas Morning News)
- Why Emerging Markets Won't Crash (Mark Dow)
- Apple and Google Know What You Want Before You Do (WSJ) see also Google Applies Pressure on Insurance Innovation (Re/code)
- Why teachers can't hotfoot it out of Kansas fast enough (Washington Post)
- There's something fishy about Donald Trump's charitable donations (Business Insider)
- Winners of the 2015 National Geographic Traveler Photo Contest (The Atlantic)

What are you reading?

China's Response to Stock Rout Exposes Regulatory Disarray

Helping Hand

Officials stepped in as stock indexes in Shanghai and Shenzhen declined.

This column does not necessarily reflect the opinion of the editorial board or Bloomberg LP and its owners.

To contact the author on this story:

Barry L Ritholtz at britholtz3@bloomberg.net

To contact the editor on this story:

Cameron Abadi at cabadi2@bloomberg.net